Abstract
This guidebook is a resource for health care providers who seek training in the areas of intimate partner violence and sexual assault. The authors describe 36 sets of training materials designed to show health care providers how to treat cases of domestic violence and sexual assault. The materials described include manuals, videos, scripted lectures with slides, information packets and handbooks. Most of these materials can be used for individual study or as part of the curriculum for staff training by a health care organization (e.g. hospital). Although designed particularly for health care providers, many of these training materials have information suitable for anyone who wishes to learn about domestic violence and sexual assault against women. The authors suggest that health care providers start their training with some of the materials described in this guidebook. Although many of the guidebook's resources do not provide comprehensive training, most are a good introduction to handling cases of intimate partner violence in a positive way.

Prevalence and health effects of intimate partner violence and non-partner sexual violence. Geneva (Switzerland): World Health Organization (WHO); 2013. 51 p. Available from the WHO Web site. Note: Although men are also victims of partner violence and sexual assault, these guidelines focus on women, because they experience more sexual violence, more severe physical violence, and more coercive control from male partners. However, much of the advice given will be relevant in respect of violence against women by family members other than intimate partners and may be relevant for partner abuse of men. Health-care providers need to have an understanding of the gender-based nature of violence against women, and of the human rights dimension of the problem.
